ABSTRACT

Livability is a fundamental guiding concept for urban planning and governance, and its definition and evaluation have become a focus of research. The term 'livability' is mostly centred on phrases such as 'Quality of Life,' 'Well-being,' and 'Life satisfaction'. It was invented and widely used to refer to a complete, systematic strategy for reversing elements of twentieth-century urban planning techniques; yet the concept maintains its ambiguity. This research paper attempts to provide a clear explanation of this term by looking at various studies and approaches used for analysing cities in terms of livability. The paper also identifies various models for measuring livability and recommends a model that could be used to measure the livability index of community.

Keywords: Livability, Urban Planning, Livability Models. Quality of life, Well-being

Introduction

Livability refers to the condition of living environment that provides inhabitants with an adequate quality of life (Pandey, et al., 2013)(Lukumanab, et al., 2017). It is a place-based notion where a simple daily characteristic may have a tremendous influence on the wellbeing/happiness of a person, his family, and the community. Livability measures how effectively a city's-built environment or services meet citizens' needs and aspirations(Kamp , et al., 2003). Livability is a behaviour-related function of the combination of environmental and human variables (Gough, 2015). It is also a very subjective term: what is considered a livable community in one place may be despised in another. Cultures and lifestyles change expectations for urban design, transportation, and other infrastructure, as well as service provision. Nonetheless, livability is a compelling concept.

The concept of livability represents overall quality of life and wellbeing, wherein the attributes of the place helps in meeting the economic, social, cultural needs of the residents of a place, promoting their health and well-being while protecting the resources and the ecosystem (Council, 2002)(Badland , et al., 2014).

History

The growing amounts of environmental design research in the 1950s and 1960s laid the foundations for livability design. Campaigners like Jane Jacobs and William Whyte launched the neighbourhood preservation movement in the 1950s to protect dense, mixed-use urban communities. Affordability, accessibility, control efficiency, and equity were all identified as livability by Kevin Lynch (1960). To develop a framework for analysing urban livability, Lynch (1981) proposed the "Good City Form" idea (Patil & Patil, 2016). In the 1970s, the US and Europe started studying methods to improve urban livability by
