Segmentation of Brain Tumor using Glcm and Discrete Wavelet Transform

Alpana Jijja, Dinesh Rai

Abstract: To identify brain tumors at an early stage is a challenging task. The brain tumor is usually diagnosed with Magnetic Resonance Imaging (MRI). When MRI spectacles a tumor in the brain, the most common way of determining the type of brain tumor after a biopsy or surgery is to look at the results of a tissue sample. In this research to detect brain tumors faster and accurately the feature extraction techniques are used to segment the tumor affected area. One of such very effective technique of feature extraction measure is the Grayscale Co-occurrence Matrix (GLCM). This research focuses on the GLCM and Discrete Wavelet Transformation (DWT) technique to detect and label the tumor from an image based on the textures and categorizing it according to a tumor or non-tumor category. The convolutional neural network (CNN) uses these features to improve the accuracy to 91%.

Keywords: Convolutional Neural Network; Discrete Wavelet Transform; Feature Extraction; Grayscale Co-occurrence Method.

I. INTRODUCTION

The human body has a brain that is one of the most complex organs. The thought of being diagnosed with a brain tumor is one troubling and life-changing case. High-tech imaging has been used in the last few decades to see inside the body for better clarity and wider details. To detect and identify the wide range of brain disorders, MRIs, CT scans, ultrasounds, and PET scans are better technologies that greatly reduce the need for exploratory surgery to make a diagnosis. Various approaches have been used to enhance the identification of brain abnormalities in MRI images. In this research paper, the texture is one of an important feature used for evaluation and identification of the region of interest in an MRI image. Texture provides information in the spatial arrangements on color or intensities in an image. The texture is determined by the spatially distributed levels of intensity in the neighbourhood [1]. The textures may vary in randomness, regularity (or periodicity), directionality, and orientation despite their origin [2,3]. Therefore, if a pattern is quite random and natural it falls into the framework of texture. Texture analysis requires defining certain characteristics or properties that differentiate or define the textures. In the segmentation and classification of image recognition, texture analysis can be used to identify the texture borders, edge direction movement [4] and long linear patterns [5]. Several authors have applied image processing techniques in various medical diagnosis applications detecting brain tumors using MRI images [6], lung cancer [7] and mammogram[8], which are methods of texture classification and texture characterization [9-11]. The most important challenge of texture analysis is to deal with shape, classification and segmentation [12-14]. Texture analysis can be helpful if characteristics in an image are more differentiated by texture than their intensities and therefore traditional thresholding techniques cannot be efficiently utilized [15]. The texture is calculated statistically across the image using a moving window. The statistical method calculates the coarseness and directionality of the texture with respect to the averages in a window of an image. However, the syntactic approach defines the structure of the entities and their distribution [16]. The important features of the statistical method to achieve a better classification, involve precision, contrast, entropy, homogeneity, autocorrelation function, power spectrum, relevant gray level statistics and matrices with co-occurrence.

II. LITERATURE REVIEW

Haralick et al., first proposed the probability of co-occurrence using GLCM in their 1973 research paper. This method is used to identify image traits and is commonly used in the field of biomedicine. The GLCM is computed in the first step, while the functionalities based on the GLCM are decided in the second step. Various fourteen textural features that include image texture information, has features such as homogeneity, linear gray-tone dependencies, contrast, number and existence of boundaries present, and image complexity [17]. Rajesh et al., research focuses on classifying cancer using MRI brain images. The technique used in this research is the Rough Set Theory which derives the characteristics of the MRI brain image classification for cancer using Feed Forward Neural Networks. The features extracted thus produces a classification efficiency of 90% [18]. Saban and Byram in their research have extracted various features using GLCM, LBP, LBGLCM, GLRLM, and SFTA algorithms. Thus after comparing the results of these algorithms, they obtained an effective algorithm for classification [19].

A. Copeland et al., in their research illustrated a strong high degree of correlation between synthetically derived textures and how different textures are perceived by human observers[20]. Manjunath and Ma implemented Gabor wavelet-derived features. Results from this work have shown that Gabor filter retrieval performance is better than typical wavelet-based orthogonal features.

Future Potential of Solar Energy: A Literature Review

-Vivek Sharma*, Namit Dang** & Amit Singh Tomar***

Abstract

Solar energy has come far away in terms of its development and usage in many parts of the world. With new technologies that are promising reduction in costs for solar energy, solar energy paves way for a new renewable future. It might be that solar energy becomes the most important source of electricity soon and beat fossil fuels. Moreover, use of solar energy will turn out to be more flexible and applicable everywhere as compared to just being produced using ground-mounted or rooftop panels. Many countries who are collectively responsible for 99.7% of global carbon dioxide emissions, according to world economic forum, are looking to switch to 80% renewable

Traditional healing practices in India: Intangible knowledge and its resultant socio-cultural sustainability

Abstract. There is an intimate relationship between our emotions and things around us. How and what we interpret from surroundings, formulates our experience of a spaces, which in turn governs the way we feel. Spatial setting has a deep impact on the practice and outcome of 'psychological and spiritual' healing. In India, there exist diverse traditional healing practices such as Ayurveda, Tibetan healing, Yunani, etc., which are the storehouses of intangible knowledge and ideas. The spaces of such practices appear to be unique and it seems that there are strong traditional ideas expressed through the physical construct of space. Such elaborate characteristics of the space enables the traditional systems to sustain in the rapidly urbanising society. The aim of this research is to explore the correlations between the spatial construct and fundamental ideas of healing as mentioned in the ancient texts of Ayurveda and Tibetan healing practice. Further, the research delves into understanding how such correlations result in socio-cultural sustainability of traditional systems. Tushita Meditation Centre at Dharamshala and I-AIM Healthcare Centre at Bengaluru are taken as primary building case studies. First-hand experience of the authors and observations with respect to the spatial construct are recorded. Further, the ancient texts of the traditional practices are studied to formulate the correlations with the ideas of healing as mentioned in the ancient texts of the respective practice. By doing such a study, we not only explore how the nature of the spaces is critical to the sustenance of the values embedded in the traditional system but also how it reflects on the overall continuity of the system. The outcome of the research is a set of correlations leading to sustainability of the traditional systems and hence, the importance of the UN Sustainable development goal 11 which suggests the strengthening of efforts to safeguard and protect natural and cultural heritage in order to lead to inclusive, sustainable and resilient cities.

1. Introduction

'Our rich and varied cultural heritage has profound power to build our nation.' [1] In the rapidly evolving world of technology and advancement, our local, indigenous and traditional communities and practices are the 'knowledge banks' of rich cultural values, which can be harnessed in order to lead to sustainable and inclusive development. Rather than a conventional understanding of the term 'sustainability', when one refers to the value infused traditional systems as 'blueprints' for sustainability, an interesting array of approaches and methodologies are revealed. Such methodologies are only successful if various stakeholders of the society contribute towards translating the intangible knowledge associated through relevant mediums such as art, literature, built environments, technology, etc. An example of such a

UNDERSTANDING THE IMPACT OF HOSPITAL MEAL ORDERING SYSTEM ON PATIENT MEAL CONSUMPTION IN PRIVATE HOSPITALS AROUND THE GLOBE.

Mr. Saurav Chhabra*
Prof. Dr. Garima Parkash**

ABSTRACT

Malnutrition in patients admitted at private hospitals can be combatted with the help of nourished meals, which in turn will increase the meal consumption rate and aids in speedy Patient's speedy recovery. Most hospitals in India especially private hospitals have a fixed cyclic menu for general ward patients and offer very limited meal choices as they focus more on patient's treatment and medical procedures rather than provision of meals and most important providing meals based on patient's preferences and likings. The result is lower meal consumption rate in private hospitals of Delhi. A positive shift has been seen lately in the hospital Administration, with the increase in the amount of research on the role of nutritional food and its positive impact on patient's overall well-being and recovery. Hospitals now give equal emphasis (if not more) to the Meal Production, Variety and delivery system. The Research provides an insight to the role of Patient Centric meal ordering system in improving patient's meal intake. The aim of the research is to list down an Alternate way i.e. through Room service type meal ordering system where the patient's have a flexibility to choose food items of their choice taking into consideration their Health status and medical restrictions. With the Concept of E-Menus followed by most of the known private hospitals outside India. A shift in the thought process of Hospital administration is the need of the hour. Collaborative innovative methods are required to improve patient's nutritional Intake besides set meals addressed as so-called balanced meals or therapeutic meals that lacks in Texture, Eye appeal and other meal related attributes.

Keywords : Nutritional, Cyclic, Collaborative, Consumption, Administration

Introduction

Optimal nutritional management and proper patient care becomes very important to avoid clinical issues in patients. Use of advance technology specially in hospitals outside India such as electronic medical records, electronic medication management, and other Wellbeing organizations, institutions & Medicinal information technology and advancements have played a key role in improving patient wellbeing, Food Hygiene, safety and clinical decision making in hospitals. (Prgomet et al, 2017 & Georgiou et al, 2011). One of the serious issues hospitals face today is Malnutrition. It is often associated with prolong hospital stay, readmissions, increased hospital infection and even higher mortality rates (Correia & Waitzberg, 2003). Electronic meal ordering systems (EMO) benefits the patient by enhancing efficiency of food service, monitoring of nutritional content, including fluid intake for individual patient and hence helps in identifying malnutrition in patients (Conrick, 2011 & Skouroliakou et al, 2009).

Review of Literature

Presence of chronic disease may impact patient's dietary intake (Pennington, 1998 and Akner & Cederholm, 2001). This may be further influenced by interruptions in meal timings (porter at al, 2015). Furthermore poor consumption can also result from the

Comparisons of Speech Parameterisation Techniques for Classification of Intellectual Disability Using Machine Learning

Gaurav Aggarwal, Manipal University Jaipur, Jaipur, India

 <https://orcid.org/0000-0003-2261-1657>

Latika Singh, Ansal University, Gurgaon, India

ABSTRACT

Classification of intellectually disabled children through manual assessment of speech at an early age is inconsistent, subjective, time-consuming and prone to error. This study attempts to classify the children with intellectual disabilities using two speech feature extraction techniques: Linear Predictive Coding (LPC) based cepstral parameters, and Mel-frequency cepstral coefficients (MFCC). Four different classification models: k-nearest neighbour (k-NN), support vector machine (SVM), linear discriminant analysis (LDA) and radial basis function neural network (RBFNN) are employed for classification purposes. 48 speech samples of each group are taken for analysis, from subjects with a similar age and socio-economic background. The effect of the different frame length with the number of filterbanks in the MFCC and different frame length with the order in the LPC is also examined for better accuracy. The experimental outcomes show that the projected technique can be used to help speech pathologists in estimating intellectual disability at early ages.

1. INTRODUCTION

In social communication, speech performs an important role to express feelings, emotions and thoughts. Communication impairments affect the process of initial cognitive development which continues to further stages. Neurodevelopment disorders, specifically, Intellectual Disability, Autism, Stuttering and Down Syndrome directly affect the speech and language development. Intellectually disabled children are highly prone to developing some speech, vocal or language disability, which has adverse effect on language development.

According to (World Health Organization, 1980), children with intellectual disability usually have impairments in language and speech which further classifies in use and comprehension of the language, deficits of the linguistic function, learning disabilities and impairments of communication. ID children also face difficulties in speech production, voice functions and speech content. The disorder

Abstract

The scope of the introduced study focuses on the analysis of heat as well as flow transportation in an oblique Casson nanofluid in the presence of an aligned magnetic field. The fluid is supposed to impinge obliquely on a sheet that stretches in both directions of the  $x$ -axis with heat generation. The moulded partial differential equations computed numerically with the shooting procedure by adopting the Runge Kutta Fehlberg method. The change in the behaviour of the emerging fluid parameters are described graphically and their results are shown in tables. The outcomes disclosed that the fluid velocity declined for Casson fluid parameter and the aligned angle of the magnetic field. In addition, with the increase in the Casson fluid parameter and aligned angle of magnetic field, the fluid temperature and concentration rise. The outcomes of this study may be beneficial to control the rate of heat and mass transportation as well as controlling fluid velocity in industry to obtain a final product of the desired quality.

Indian Response to Pandemic: A Journey from 1918 Pandemic to Covid-2019

Abstract

Uncertainty is always hard to predict and estimate. It is not only a challenge to individuals but to the businesses and the governments as well. Often we prepare ourselves to tackle these uncertainties and many times tackle the uncertain conditions with outside support. However, the most challenging situation arise when all have to be dealt at once. This is what has been experienced during Covid -19. If we search through the archival records, an event with similar spread and impact can be traced during 1918 pandemic, termed as Spanish flu. Although the Spanish flu and its impact are under reported, the lessons learnt from the pandemic Spanish Flu can guide us on a way to tackle Covid-19 in a better way.

Keywords: 1918 Pandemic; Covid-2019 ; Lockdown; Unlock.

Introduction

On the Huanan seafood market in Wuhan, China, SARSCoV2 appears to have made the leap from animals to people. Attempts to identify probable intermediate hosts, on the other hand, appear to have been neglected in Wuhan, and the exact route of transmission must be determined as soon as possible (Nandal, Nandal, & Anuradha, 2020).

Covid-19 has put humankind in unprecedented situation. The world is facing public health crisis and economic downturn. The situation seems alarming for India due to its large population and limited medical facilities. Indeed, timely lockdown decision by Government of India has successfully reduced the fatality rate across nation under the prevailing conditions. However, relaxations given to revive the economy has increased the threat of community spread. This becomes evident from the active cases reaching 90,95,908 as on 22 November 2020. Government, researchers and practitioners are exploring every possible solution to rescue us from this "New normal" and take us back to the times of socializing and on the path of 5 trillion economies. However, the situation has constrained us to look into archival records for lessons to tackle this challenge. From the books of history, Spanish Flu in 1918 seems a relevant period/event to be explored. The virus is known as 'Spanish Flu' as only Spain (a neutral country in World War I) allowed its newspapers to public the national death toll.

Abstract

Kolkata, one of the major metropolitan cities in India, owns a great and heroic past, bearing its unique heritage and culture, owes its creation to its strategic location along the east bank of the river Hooghly, a distributary of the river Ganges. The banks of the river, once the lifeline of the people, remained bustling with different activities. They have become deserted areas, dotted with shabby old structures, disconnected with the city, and devoid of erstwhile scenic views. In the recent past, the riverfront has become the backyard of the city, derelict of any desired activity leading to escalating environmental and urban issues. The river-edge precincts and its neighbourhoods have died out in terms of their social association with the river. It is evident that the city has lost the social eminence of its riverfront because of the indifferent behaviour towards its revival. A discussion in response to the social issues of addressing the urban concern for finding a suitable solution or method to revive the lost values of an urban river has been elaborated within the paper. This research paper explored the principles of building a framework of developing tools for redefining the value of an urban riverfront through strengthening its cultural and social bonds with the city.

Cultural Ecology and Happiness, a Case Study of Western Bhutanese Settlements

Amrita Madan, Yash Pratap Singh Shekhawat and Piyush Das

Abstract

The idea of well-being is rarely explored when seen through the perspective of continuum of traditional knowledge systems. Knowledge creation, knowledge retention and knowledge transfer are some of the methods to evaluate the components of significant cultural ecosystems. These anthropological methods also give directions to uncover very delicate yet very strong connections between one's 'beingwell/happy' and the authentic dependency on the larger continued and perceived cultural ecosystem.

Complex historic regions of Bhutan showcase exemplary practices of associating their tangible and intangible inheritance (cultural & natural) with well-being, creating unique interpretations of the idea. Through an intensive primary study that is supported by philosophical underpinnings, in this paper, we explore cultural and spatial processes involved in the continuation of traditional knowledge systems; the manner and degree of exploitation of nature; the dependency and interdependency between culture and nature; and the sophisticated yet blurred line differences between the tangibles and intangibles. This inquiry into Bhutan, establishes how such extensive components of heritage, as evidenced in their urban centres, are directly linked with the continue cultural

INTRODUCTION TO INDUSTRIAL MATHEMATICS

Abstract-There is no question that mathematics has played a leading role in the development of physics and engineering through the last century. However the direct participation of mathematicians in solving the problems of industry is the new trend, so called "industrial mathematics". Industrial mathematics has developed as a new profession. In this report, we will talk about the concepts of industrial mathematics and its importance in the society.

Keywords: industrial mathematics.

1. INTRODUCTION

Mathematics is one of the oldest and fundamental sciences. The word 'mathematics' has been derived from the Greek word mathema meaning 'knowledge, study, learning'. It has no generally accepted definition but deals with logical reasoning and quantitative calculation.[3]

Mathematician is a person who uses the exclusive knowledge of mathematics in their work. The education of mathematicians focuses on mathematics itself as a way to understand the relationship between abstract objects. Some mathematicians explore theories while others apply them to solve daily problems. They try to be as precise and concise as they could while solving a problem. When asked to solve a problem, usually a person will think of the ways they know that can be applied to solve the problem and would back-off if he is unable to find such a way. But a mathematician will abstract the problem into a mathematical problem and apply mathematical abilities to solve it. If he is unsuccessful in solving the problem, he re-thinks of the models and takes a different approach. He continues until he is successful in finding the solution.[1]

Modern mathematics is broadly divided into Pure Mathematics and Applied Mathematics. The difference between the two is based on their application. [4] Pure Mathematics is a branch of mathematics that is studied, and principles are developed for the sake of mathematics rather than their immediate use. In other words, it is based on number theory. The Fibonacci Series is an example of this, which has almost no significant use to mankind. On the contrary, Applied Mathematics is a branch of mathematics that is involved in the study of the physical or biological world, that is, studied purely for application purposes. It is based on numerical methods, having extensive use in Computer science and engineering.

2. INDUSTRIAL MATHEMATICS

Mathematics is the most versatile of all the sciences. It is uniquely well placed to respond to the demands of a rapidly changing economic landscape. Unfortunately, academic mathematics is insufficiently connected to mathematics used in the industries, making it difficult to build closer connections to industry. Hence, academic mathematical science must strike a better balance between theory and application.

Industrial Mathematics is a new research field in mathematics, which deals with the use of mathematical modelling to solve industrial problems, thereby serving as the foundation for developing future technologies. It comprises of a mixture of pure and applied mathematical modelling such as Partial Differential Equations, Probability, Statistics, Discrete Mathematics and many more. In other words, it will integrate and reorganize pure and applied mathematics into a volatile form so as to respond to the needs of industrial technologies.

Let us consider a case study of a Mexican company who had complained regarding the noise from the car-seat air-con fan blowers. They were having a great loss as their products were returned stating about an undesirable noise. They did not clearly understand what kind of noise was undesirable. Many analysis were made but the noise considered undesirable by the Mexican manufacturing plant was different to what the client plant considered to be. This is where mathematicians rescued them. They measured the noise frequency spectrum with a special microphone and computer, investigated which frequencies were annoying to human hearing, statistically analysed the noise spectrum and revealed which frequency bands were undesirable from the viewpoint of the client company. They then wrote a computer script that could automatically determine if an item is defective or not.[1] This was one of the incidents when industry benefited from the work of mathematicians.

It is evident from the above case study that the ability to effectively use mathematical modelling, simulation, control and optimisation will be the foundation for technological and economic development, helping in achieving better understanding of industrial models and processes.

Introduction:-

From the certain ages in India almost all the important decisions of a women life are taken by her brother, father or husband including the decisions relating to finance. However, in the current scenario the women's are stepping out from the boundaries and making an independent career for themselves. The women are not only climbing the professional ladder at an increasing rate but also acquiring the required financial knowledge so that they can be able to manage their finances with their own, but for managing the finances independently and efficiently it's very necessary to have a correct financial knowledge. To be financially independent besides of

Reconnecting the City to its Riverfront: A Case of Kolkata

Abstract

Kolkata, one of the major metropolitan cities in India, owns a great and heroic past, bearing its unique heritage and culture, owes its creation to its strategic location along the east bank of the river Hooghly, a distributary of the river Ganges. The banks of the river, once the lifeline of the people, remained bustling with different activities. They have become deserted areas, dotted with shabby old structures, disconnected with the city, and devoid of erstwhile scenic views. In the recent past, the riverfront has become the backyard of the city, derelict of any desired activity leading to escalating environmental and urban issues. The river-edge precincts and its neighbourhoods have died out in terms of their social association with the river. It is evident that the city has lost the social eminence of its riverfront because of the indifferent behaviour towards its revival. A discussion in response to the social issues of addressing the urban concern for finding a suitable solution or method to revive the lost values of an urban river has been elaborated within the paper. This research paper explored the principles of building a framework of developing tools for redefining the value of an urban riverfront through strengthening its cultural and social bonds with the city.
