Abstract:

In today's developing world, all devices are becoming smarter and communicate with other devices. Recent innovations in technology and increased use of IoT systems has led to increase in the Distributed Denial of Service (DDoS) attacks causing harm to information being processed. Considering IoT networks, the dynamics of intruder activity require even better IDS models that can detect multiple attacks with higher detection rates and lower computing resource requirements. Fake requests (chat-bots) occupy the systems under DDoS attacks and actual users are deprived of the system services. In this article, we discuss different categories of D-DoS attacks with their impact on IoT

Customer participation and Consumer trends in the hospitality industry

Deepak Thakur

Assistant Professor at Sushant University, Gurugram

Abstract: This comprehensive review delves into the prevailing consumer trends and the active engagement of customers within the dynamic landscape of the hospitality industry, spanning a considerable duration of several years. The primary focus revolves around the evolving needs of an aging population in the realm of hospitality services, shedding light on their distinct requirements. Furthermore, it explores the diverse spectrum of consumers hailing from various demographics, emphasizing the multifaceted nature of customer preferences.

Against the backdrop of the unprecedented global impact inflicted by the Covid-19 pandemic on the world economy, particularly the hospitality sector, there is a discernible acknowledgment within the industry of the necessity to implement substantial changes in the day-to-day operations. This response is geared towards effectively addressing the initial repercussions of the crisis while also strategically navigating through a dynamic business and legal landscape that is in a state of flux. The discourse extends beyond the immediate challenges faced by the hospitality industry, encompassing not only the Indian scenario but also providing insightful comparisons with the experiences in Canada and Finland.

In the midst of the ongoing crisis, the hospitality sector finds itself at a pivotal juncture, actively seeking out and capitalizing on novel opportunities. The industry is adopting a forward-thinking approach, employing innovative techniques, cutting-edge technology, and digital

Abstract:

In today's developing world, all devices are becoming smarter and communicate with other devices. Recent innovations in technology and increased use of IoT systems has led to increase in the Distributed Denial of Service (DDoS) attacks causing harm to information being processed. Considering IoT networks, the dynamics of intruder activity require even better IDS models that can detect multiple attacks with higher detection rates and lower computing resource requirements. Fake requests (chat-bots) occupy the systems under DDoS attacks and actual users are deprived of the system services. In this article, we discuss different categories of D-DoS attacks with their impact on IoT

LAND VALUE CAPTURE AND ITS FINANCIAL IMPLICATIONS IN INDIAN CONTEXT

Poorva Singh, Shriraj Javia, Student, Department of Planning and Development, School of Art & Architecture, Sushant University

Dr. Himadri S. Dey, Assistant Professor, Department of Planning and Development, School of Art & Architecture, Sushant University

Abstract

Land is a major economic resource for any state. Economy generation sets the backbone of any planning related activity. The demand, supply, availability, amenities and value are determined by the human settlement around the land. Land related revenues play a major role in building the economic base of any state in India. Therefore, it is crucial to improvise and regulate the land value capture mechanism for the well functioning of Indian cities. Land value capture mechanism shall be taken into consideration while master planning of Indian cities. The research paper aims to analyse the mechanism of Land Value Capture through secondary research and formulation of a set of indicators to assess the land value capture mechanism for Indian cities. Further, the research paper aims to formulate recommendations for improvising the LVC mechanism of Indian cities.

The paper strongly highlights upon the role of LVC in Urban Planning, the mechanism, financial implications and legal framework related to Land Value Capture. The research paper also lays out some of the important case studies related to LVC in Indian Cities. On the basis of the secondary study and case studies, the paper lays out a framework of indicators to assess the LVC mechanism of cities and draws recommendation to improvise this mechanism for Indian cities.

Keywords: Land Value Capture, Economy, Central Business District, Finance, Taxation

I. Introduction

The research topic, "Land Value Capture and Its Financial Implications in the Indian Context," is situated within the dynamic and rapidly evolving landscape of urban development in India. The background and context of this research elucidate the multifaceted challenges and opportunities that underscore the significance of examining Land Value Capture (LVC) as a financial strategy for addressing the burgeoning urbanization and fiscal demands in the Indian subcontinent.

Land is a major asset in any country. People are the source who's demand governs the availability, amenities and price of this asset. A major aspect in the determination of value of a land asset is the formation of a Central Business District (CBD). The formation of a CBD determines the availability of amenities in a certain radius of the asset. These amenities determine the value of the land asset. The determinance of the land value is an advantageous aspect for the local economy of the state. The land value capture is a major aspect that draws the fiscal requirements of the state.

1.1 The Urbanization Imperative in India

India, as one of the most populous countries globally, is experiencing a seismic demographic shift marked by a profound urbanization imperative. The country's urban population is projected to surge, with the majority of its citizens migrating from rural to urban areas. This profound demographic transformation is fuelled by economic opportunities and the allure of urban living, creating a substantial and growing urban population. This rapid urbanization, while emblematic of India's growth, presents unprecedented challenges.

As the number of people living in Indian cities continues to swell, the pressure on urban infrastructure, housing, and public services escalates significantly. Existing urban infrastructure struggles to accommodate the burgeoning urban population, leading to infrastructural deficits and a rising demand for new urban projects and facilities. This demographic transition necessitates substantial investments in urban development to meet the infrastructural and housing needs of the urban populace.

Decoupling Economic Growth and Waste Generation - A key to Sustainable Waste Management.

Inderjeet Kaur¹, Prof Surinder Deswal¹

Abstract: The exponential growth in population, urbanization, and socio-economic development, over the years have resulted in the huge spike of waste across towns/cities of India. The cities have managed to grow economically albeit in a very unsustainable way, where this unmanaged waste has become a major cause of concern for both public health and the environment around. This atrocious state of unmanaged waste is the major concern at present for sustainability. In this paper, an effort is made to highlight the significance of decoupling economic growth with the waste generation as in absence of this, Indian urban cities may have a tough time in accommodating further urbanization. An effort therefore is made to study the gap in present waste management and then have tried to establish the correlation among percentage of Waste Generation, Percentage of Population Growth and Percentage of GDP growth of different states of India. The study finally concludes that to achieve the objective of the second phase of SBM-U, launched on 1st October 2021, for a period of 5 years, to achieve "Garbage Free" status for all cities by 2026, Circular Economy can help India decouple its economic growth with the waste generation and as we know, waste management is the entry point of Sustainability. Therefore, what we need to stress upon is Zero Waste through making it resource by recycling, reducing, redesigning, and reworking upon it.

Keywords: urbanization, decoupling, waste management, sustainability, SBM 2, circular economy

1 Introduction

India is the seventh largest country by its geographical area and now the top most populous country with over 1.4 billion people amounting to 17.7% of total world's population. India along with its growth in different economic sectors, has also witnessed the enormous upspring in population and urbanization. As per the 2018 reports of UN DESA, Urban & Rural Population, there is a growth of 2.3 percent each year in the urban population of India and by 2031, two third of economic output is estimated to come out of cities. Looking at such expansion, cities need to prepare themselves for the upcoming challenges in terms of infrastructure, management of existing facilities and preparing for the future demands.

Out of all the challenges, one of the biggest challenges currently is management of solid waste and primarily the municipal solid waste which becomes the primary concern of authorities managing the waste, once collected from the source. Municipal Solid waste (MSW) is the emerging challenge for the fast-developing countries like India and therefore its management in terms of collection, treatment and disposal is the massive challenge too. Various research, stands as a proof that growing municipal solid waste and its poor management, has multiple environmental impacts and public health impacts in terms of greenhouse gas emission, leachate production, climate conditions and landfilling operations. Though there had been plenty of reviews done on the poor and unsustainable ways of management of waste, still there is a need for continuous research on the current waste management scenario to bring about the picture from other different perspectives.

Abstract

This chapter explores the barriers and potential of blockchain technology in the FinTech sector. It begins by highlighting the fundamental characteristics of blockchains, emphasizing their ability to securely store and transfer data without the involvement of intermediaries. The transparency provided by blockchain's transaction visibility is contrasted with traditional banking systems. The decentralized nature of blockchain is discussed, along with its applicability in various industries such as cryptocurrencies, financial services, risk management, IoT, and public and social services. The chapter acknowledges the extensive research conducted to analyze blockchain technology and its applications, leading to a need for a comprehensive examination. It addresses blockchain taxonomy, consensus techniques, applications, technological challenges, and recent developments, offering insights into the future possibilities of this technology. By identifying both the barriers and potential, this chapter aims to contribute to the understanding of blockchain technology's role in the FinTech industry.

Blockchain Architecture

Like a public ledger, blockchain blocks include all transaction records (Chuen, 2015). Figure 1 depicts a blockchain system. In most cases, a hash value is utilized in order to guarantee that each block precisely copies its parent block. The hashes of uncle blocks, which are blocks that are the offspring of the blocks that are ancestors of the current block, would likewise be preserved on the Ethereum blockchain (Buterin, 2014). Genesis blocks have no parents.

Abstract

Mycotoxins are natural secondary metabolites produced by filamentous fungi and are commonly found in both food and feed. These toxic compounds are primarily generated by fungal species belonging to Aspergillus, Fusarium, Penicillium, and Alternaria. The presence of mycotoxins in the food chain raises significant concerns for human health, as these compounds can induce severe toxicity even at low doses. The contamination of fruits with mycotoxins not only poses health hazards but also leads to substantial economic losses, particularly for countries engaged in exporting such food commodities. Among the mycotoxins commonly found in fruits and their processed products are aflatoxins, ochratoxin A, patulin, as well as Alternaria toxins such as alternariol, alternariol methyl ether, and altenuene. These mycotoxins are carcinogenic, immunosuppressive, neurotoxic, genotoxic, teratogenic, and also cause some complications like cerebral edema, impaired child growth, balkan endemic nephropathy, etc. The objective of this study is to conduct a comprehensive review on the toxicity of major mycotoxins, their natural presence in fruits, dried fruits, juices, wines, and various processed products. The review also focuses on the available analytical methods for detecting these mycotoxins and discusses the strategies employed for their control and mitigation.

Keywords: Food safety, Mycotoxin, Aspergillus, Fusarium, Penicillium, Alternaria

INTRODUCTION

It is well known in this era & in this century that fruit juices are one of the major sources of vitamins (with low calory), minerals which they may serve as antioxidants, and also play a crucial role in preventing numerous ailments and disease like diabetes mellitus, heart diseases, dermatological problems, cancer and even aging in men & women¹ to which their consumption was so high these days both men & woman, elders and children. Mycotoxins are basically natural products having low molecular weight that are created as secondary metabolites by some threadlike-like fungi species, which mostly. There are almost 400 metabolites classified & termed as mycotoxins of which less than or a dozen are found to be very deleterious to human beings when exposed to them through direct intake of such toxins via food kinds of stuff, vegetables, fruits, meat, eggs, and even dust that are contaminated with these toxins³ etc. These mycotoxins are usually produced by different fungi/molds mainly from Aspergillus, Alternaria or Claviceps. Fusarium & Penicillium genera respectively⁴. It has been shown that in one study that raw materials usually were found to have tolerated higher contamination levels (excluding the consumable) than the Completed goods, and these fugal metabolites are practical unavoidable contaminants in foods and feeds right from pre/post harvesting depending on the level of care/sanity given during these agricultural processes⁵. And this has also being seen that it occurs as a result of dilution effect (during formulation) with noncontaminated ingredients when preparing the final product likewise the potential reduction in negative effects through processing. Therefore, the concentration of mycotoxin in the final product is expected to be lower than in the raw material. Toxin formation can occur both in the field and during the storage of agricultural commodities, whether in their raw or processed states food⁶. But it is well known that plants typically evolve efficient detoxification system to counteract fungal infections. It has being shown in one study that these mycotoxins are usually released from the food by the process of digestion as a result of administration of food that has been tainted or polluted with harmful substances into the stomach⁵. It was being found that natural acids (e.g., tartaric acids, malic acids, citric acids) found in fruits imparting tartness to fruits inhibit bacterial spoilage by reducing the Ph, thereby creating an environment less conducive to bacterial growth. This pH of fruit can vary among the different species of fruits, to which usually ranges from <2.5 to 5.0 which discourages bacterial growth but well tolerable for many fungal species⁷. The mycotoxins which are deleterious to human being and most commonly found mycotoxin in fruits and their processed products are aflatoxins, ochratoxin A, patulin and Alternaria toxins respectively⁸. Currently in this century it has being reported that almost all the developed and most of the developing countries have their own maximum levels (MLs) of mycotoxin being established for certain food commodities and feed are regulated to safeguard both animal and public health as well⁷.

Multimodal Biometric Identification System

Biometrics provides greater security and usability than conventional identification methods. In order to render an effective biometric system this book provides an improved multi-model biometric recognition based on iris and fingerprints. The work is established on three modules which are pre-processing module, feature extraction module and recognition module. At first, pre-processing is performed through histogram equalization on input image to enhance its quality. Then, the extraction of the feature set is performed which include modified Local Binary Pattern (MLBP), GLCM with orientation transformation, and DWT features. Consequently, the optimum function is found with the Rider Optimization Algorithm (ROA). Fusion of optimized fingerprint and iris features is carried out with the help of Fish Swarm optimization algorithm. Further, Improved Multi Kernel Support vector machine (IMKSVM) and Deep Neural Network (DNN) algorithms are used for authentication process. In IMKSVM, several kernels are integrated to give shape to a hybrid kernel. Alternatively, DNN is a multi-layered artificial neural network which finds the right mathematical transformation to turn input into output.
